

The American Community Survey: How the Data are Used

The questions on the American Community Survey are included to produce statistics needed to manage federal programs or comply with federal laws, regulations or court decisions. The data help determine how more than $400 billion of federal tax dollars are allocated annually to local communities. State and local leaders, planners and businesses use the data to help make important decisions.

Here are just a few examples of the questions from the American Community Survey and how the data are used:

Ethnic Origin? Used by the Public Health Service Act to identify segments of the population that might not be getting adequate medical services.

Marital Status? Used by the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development to help determine which areas are eligible for Low-Income Housing Tax Credits.

Grandparents as Primary Caregivers? Used by the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services to administer the Temporary Assistance to Needy Families program.

English Language Ability? Used to assist with voting per the Voting Rights Act.

Educational Attainment? Used to distribute funds to school districts for adult education.

Residence One Year Ago? Used by numerous federal programs concerned with employment, housing, education and the elderly.

Commute to Work? Used as the basis for transportation planning by state departments of transportation and the more than 350 metropolitan planning organizations.

Plumbing and Kitchen Facilities? Used by federal programs that distribute housing grants to state and local areas.

An explanation of the purpose of every question on the survey can be found in the "Background" section of the ACS online Media Tool Kit.
