Abstract

This paper describes research testing the Targeted Coverage Followup (TCFU) interview which will attempt to resolve instances of people who appear to have been counted twice in the census because of child custody arrangements, seasonal homes, moving, college or other similar situations. The research utilizes the cognitive interviewing method on a targeted convenience sample of respondents known to have multiple addresses. This report describes in detail the data we collected and discusses various issues with the TCFU form and recommendations for improvements for the next round of testing.

2009 Targeted Coverage Follow-Up (TCFU) Cognitive Testing

1. Background

The U.S. Census Bureau estimated that 5.8 million people were counted twice in Census 2000 (Mule, 2002). This could have happened for many different reasons, including: a family could have moved and filled out census forms for both addresses; a child in shared custody could have been counted both with his father and his mother; a couple could have been counted at their primary address and at their seasonal home; or a college student could have been counted both at home and in the dorm. The goal of the census is to count each person once, only once, and in the right place. This paper describes a cognitive interviewing study of an experimental questionnaire that attempts to resolve duplicates in the census. The goal of this questionnaire was to have the respondent confirm that the person (or persons) in question lived or stayed at more than one address, and also report enough information about their living situation to determine where they should be counted using census residence rules. The goal of the cognitive interview study was to evaluate comprehension, accuracy, and sensitivity issues that might surround this questionnaire.

1.1 Census Duplication Research

Census 2000 was the first U.S. census to incorporate the computer capture of names and dates of birth by optical character recognition as an integral part of the processing (Fay, 2004). This allowed for computer matching of person records to identify suspected duplicates in the census. As a result of the high rate of identified suspected duplicates in the 2000 Census, research since then has focused on identifying potential duplicates in the census and following up with them to resolve the duplication. The general approach that the Census Bureau has taken to resolve computer-identified duplicates is to interview the household again and ask standard follow-up questions that are used to resolve many other difficult coverage situations via the Coverage Followup (CFU) interview. This interview is not specific to the type of coverage situation, but asks if any person in the household stayed at another place – listing the types of places that we know people are often duplicated (e.g., college, at a job, in the military, with parents in a custody situation).³ However, research has shown the current CFU interview to be ineffective at resolving duplication in the census (see Heimel, 2010 for a summary of this research). Often, when interviewed, the suspected duplicated person does not reveal the alternate address where computer match duplicate is identified, nor do they identify the fact that there is any another place that they have stayed.

The Census Bureau has been very cautious of dealing with suspected duplicates because of privacy and confidentiality concerns. Under Title 13 of the United States Code, the Census Bureau cannot release identifying information about respondents to anyone who is not a sworn census employee (or agent). For this reason, the Census Bureau is very hesitant to reveal any information about a suspected duplicate person to someone who may not be that duplicated person, or may be a person that is unauthorized to have information about the duplicated person. For example, we could interview a respondent, Jane Doe, whose demographic information exactly matches a different Jane Doe. We do not want to accidentally tell the first Jane Doe about the existence of the second Jane Doe. A second example would be where Jane Doe has left her abusive husband, John Doe. We would not want to tell John where Jane is living now by consequence of the interview. For these reasons, we cannot call both addresses and say that we have Jane Doe reported as living both at 101 Main Street and 200 Sister Lane.

There is an important distinction between privacy and confidentiality at the Census Bureau. Privacy refers to how the Census Bureau respects and minimizes intrusion on the personal life of the respondent. Respondents may report feelings of invasion of privacy when they feel that we are asking questions that we (as the Census Bureau or the Federal Government) do not have the right to ask about. In the context of this study, privacy deals with the amount of information the Census Bureau can ask about other places people stay. Confidentiality prohibits the Census Bureau from sharing respondents' data with anyone who is unauthorized to see such data (e.g., neighbors, other respondents, other households, other government agencies). Respondents may report or indicate feelings of a breach of confidentiality when they feel that the Census Bureau may have given their personal information to another individual or household.

In 2008, researchers cognitively interviewed a small sample of respondents for whom a household member had been identified as a suspected duplicate in the 2008 Census Dress Rehearsal data (i.e., the same person seems to have been counted in two households; Childs, Fernández, Clifton and Meyers, 2009). In that study, researchers told the respondent directly that the person “may have been counted at another residence” without revealing exactly where that residence was. Cognitive testing revealed that, using this approach, some respondents may have felt that their confidentiality has been breached. To illustrate this, one respondent was a father who had sole custody of his children. Upon hearing that his children may have been counted twice in the census, he became upset that their mother had counted them. If this respondent contacted the children's mother, she may have felt like the Census Bureau breached her confidentiality by telling the respondent how she responded to the census. Notice that we had not told him that the children had been counted somewhere else definitively, nor had we told him where they had been counted or who had counted them. The respondent inferred that if they had been counted twice, it was their mother who would have counted them. Because of this deduction, she may feel that the Census Bureau revealed her personal information. Based on this type of reaction (which was seen to a lesser degree with a couple of other respondents), our strategy for interviewing about duplicates changes.

1.2 Targeted Coverage Followup (TCFU) Study

In the study described in this paper, we conducted cognitive testing on a sample of respondents for whom it was known by the researchers that a household member had two addresses and (if it was the time of the census) would have the potential to be duplicated. This study was not as realistic as the 2008 study, because we did not have access to current census records where we could interview computer-identified duplicates. Instead, we interviewed respondents where we thought a duplication was possible to occur in the census. This study used a less direct approach than the 2008 study that asked a series of in-depth, age-targeted questions about other places the person could have been duplicated.

The objective of this research was to conduct cognitive testing of an experimental questionnaire, the Targeted Coverage Follow-Up (TCFU) as a part of the Census Program of Evaluations and Experiments (CPEX; see Heimel, 2010 for the full study plan). This cognitive test studied whether or not respondents understood the experimental TCFU questions, as well as whether or not the questions functioned as intended to reveal the suspected duplicate address. Because of the confidentiality concerns identified in the original cognitive test, this study was particularly concerned with maintaining respondent's feelings of confidentiality. Because this questionnaire uses a more in-depth series of questions than other similar interview instruments (e.g., Coverage Follow-up, Census Coverage Measurement Person Interview, Census Coverage Measurement Person Followup), this cognitive test also looked for potential privacy concerns.

In 2010, the TCFU, revised after this cognitive test, will be subjected to a larger qualitative interviewing study where approximately 300 respondents who either are suspected duplicates in the 2010 Census, or are reporting for household members who are suspected duplicates in the 2010 Census, will be interviewed (see Heimel, 2010). The goal of the current study is to improve the questionnaire prior to the larger study. If the TCFU is successful at resolving suspected duplicates in the larger-scale test, then it will be further tested leading up to the 2020 Census. If fielded in 2020, it will likely be a CATI interview, and as such, the script was developed to be administered over the phone.

1.3 Development of the TCFU Questionnaire

The TCFU questionnaire was developed using the information that has been obtained through prior qualitative and quantitative research involving living situations and census duplication. When someone is a suspected duplicate in the census, the exact details of the situation can differ in a number of ways. For example, a whole household could be counted in two places for several reasons – the household could have moved close to census day and be reported on forms for both addresses, or the family could have a seasonal home where they were mistakenly counted in addition to their primary home. This whole household duplicate may have the same phone number associated with both places (either by having the number transferred during a move, or by using a cell phone at both locations), or they could have different phone numbers at the different addresses.

A single person could be duplicated for the same reasons (moving, or having a seasonal home) or different reasons. Other reasons for duplication could include staying with a boyfriend or girlfriend, with two sets of parents or grandparents, in an apartment that is closer to a job or in another part of the country with an aging relative. We suspect that many of these types of situations may be predicted by age group. College-age people may be more likely to be duplicated because they are in college, or with significant others. Older adults may be more likely to be duplicated for health reasons than younger people. Children may be more likely to be duplicated because they stay with another parent or relative. In many of these cases, one would not expect the phone numbers to match between units because they often involve living with other people.

Additionally, if a person was counted both in a traditional housing situation, called a Housing Unit (HU) in census terminology, and in a group living situation, called a Group Quarters (GQ), then their data would appear differently in the records. We would know, for instance, that the person was counted in a HU as well as in a college dorm, jail, or nursing home, as the case may be.

Because of all of the diverse possible reasons for duplication and because past attempts at questioning suspected duplicates had not been successful, the TCFU questionnaire asks targeted questions about the suspected duplicated people based on 1) whether or not the phone numbers matched, 2) the age of the people who are duplicated, and 3) whether the match was a HU-HU match or a HU-GQ match. Each person in the household who is a suspected duplicate is asked a series of age-targeted questions. Household members who are not suspected duplicates are not asked any questions. This was the recommended strategy coming out of the previous testing (Childs, et al., 2009).

The “other reasons” mentioned above include a broad range of categories such as education or training, athletics or sports, hobbies, camps or lessons, vacations or retreats, to care for someone, because of financial problems, conferences or conventions, because of health problems, and anywhere else (even for just one night or on the weekend). There was not an expectation that a lot of respondents would answer “yes” to these probes, but we wanted a “catch all” if the respondent had failed to mention another address as a result of the other more targeted probes. See Appendix A, Sections F, G and H, for specific question wording for each of these questions.

There are also circumstances where we think a person may have been duplicated between a HU and GQ. In those instances, we have information about the specific type of group quarter where we think the person was duplicated so we ask questions that are specifically written for each type of place. Table 2 shows these questions at a high level. See Appendix A, Sections I through Q, for specific question wording for each of these questions.

The entire tested questionnaire can be found in Appendix A. The revised version that will be tested in 2010 can be found in Appendix B.

2. Methods

The TCFU questionnaire was developed to have a targeted series of questions for people who we suspect were duplicated for different reasons. Respondents were recruited for the cognitive test to fit into many of the categories of questions that were developed. Additionally, a series of debriefing questions posed hypothetical situations to test situations that we did not expect to find during cognitive testing. This section goes into more detail on how respondents were recruited and the methods used for this test.

2.1 Respondent Characteristics

In order to test respondents who fit very particular criteria, we recruited respondents for whom the researchers had knowledge that the person had more than one place to stay and could have been duplicated in the census if it took place at the current time. We requested that the respondent not be informed of the reason that they were chosen to be interviewed, but rather they were told that the interview dealt with their household, activities that they did in the current year, and places they might have stayed (note that this is a true statement, we only hid from them the fact that researchers knew from personal knowledge that they had more than one place to stay during the year).

We recruited by word of mouth, providing the following list of types of people that we wanted to interview to our Census Bureau colleagues:

- People who stay a significant amount of time at a boyfriend/girlfriend/significant other's house.
- Children in joint custody, or children that stay somewhere else for childcare purposes (like during the week at grandma's so they can go to a preferred school district).
- People who own another home - even if they just rent it out to someone else.
- People who rent a house for someone else - e.g., parents who rent an apartment for their daughter to live in while in college.
- People with a household member that has spent some time this year in a nursing home, assisted living facility, rehab hospital, general or psychiatric hospital.
- Household member in the military who has another place to stay- e.g., wife lives locally and husband is stationed in Norfolk but comes home on the weekends.
- Household member whose job requires them to travel a lot or back and forth to a particular place.

In this manner, we recruited and interviewed 23 respondents in the greater Washington DC metropolitan area in September of 2009. Interviews were conducted in Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia and the District of Columbia. Interviews were tape recorded and respondents were paid $40 each. Table 4 presents the reasons that each of these respondents was recruited.

Table 4. Respondents Recruited by Reason.

	Number of Respondents Fitting Each Criteria*

Children in custody	3
Own another home	5
Nursing home, or other GQ	2
Job or military	3
Moved	7
Stayed with Relatives	9

*These numbers do not sum to the total number of respondents because some respondents fit into more than one recruitment category.

2.3 Cognitive Interview Methods

In the cognitive interviews, researchers administered the TCFU questionnaire, followed by a semi-structured cognitive debriefing interview to determine whether or not the experimental questions were understood as intended, as well as to evaluate the sensitivity of the experimental questions. After administering the questionnaire, the cognitive interviewer first asked some overall questions to assess the general feeling of respondent burden upon completion of the interview, as well as what time period the respondent was considering and whether any particular questions stood out as difficult or sensitive. Then, the interviewer went back through the entire interview with the respondent, noting any difficulty that the respondent expressed during the interview, inquiring about anything unusual that was noted during the interview, and giving the respondent a chance to mention anything else that had come to mind during the interview. Following that, a series of debriefing questions was asked about each part of the interview that was administered to that particular respondent (remember that questions were targeted by circumstance and age).

2.4 Limitations

Our sample of respondents for this study was not from actual duplicate records in a census or a test census. This limits our findings in several ways. First, there was some sensitivity expressed in the previous study when some respondents realized that their children (or grandchildren) had been duplicated in the census (Childs, et al., 2009). Because the respondents in the current study had not recently participated in the census or a test census they were not subject to the same potential sensitivity that respondents in the first study faced. Though this questionnaire was developed so that respondents would not figure out that they had actually been duplicated, it is possible that respondents could figure it out in a real census environment. We were not able to assess this risk in cognitive testing, but will be able to assess it in the qualitative interviewing that will happen with this questionnaire in 2010.

Second, we interviewed a small number of respondents in each of these categories, and we were not able to interview respondents in most of the GQ categories, so we cannot be confident that we have identified and resolved all possible problems with this questionnaire. Again, we will get a better assessment of this with the larger number of qualitative interviews in 2010.

Third, the TCFU was designed to be a phone survey. This cognitive testing was conducted face-to-face. The difference in mode may impact both respondents' feelings of burden as well as privacy concerns. We did ask questions about how respondents would react to this interview if it were over the phone and will report on those responses in the results section; however, this was asked in a hypothetical manner and we have no evidence of how respondents would really react over the phone.

Finally, this sample was not random, nor representative. Because we recruited by word of mouth, mostly through contacts of Census Bureau staff, the respondents in this study were more likely to be more educated than the average public, and this could impact their responses. Additionally, most respondents in this study were non-minority. Any interaction of race or ethnicity could not be determined through this study. The qualitative interviews in 2010 should not have this limitation.

There are several other limitations of the TCFU operation as it is designed. These limitations apply to the cognitive test, but also to the general operation. The HU-GQ series is only designed to handle a single HU-GQ match. If the household has multiple members in GQs (the same or different GQs), the operation is not capable of handling both. For example, if a household has two children in college, only one could be followed up on using the current design. This is a limitation that could be improved in the future. In addition, this operation was designed to only interview at HUs, not at GQs. The TCFU is not designed to contact someone at a GQ asking about living at a HU (though this also could be done). Lastly, we designed the TCFU with the intent that we would talk directly to the duplicate person (if they are old enough to talk to). If the person, or a knowledgeable proxy, is not available at the HU, then the interview cannot be conducted.

3. Results and Recommendation

The next two sections discuss findings that applied to the overall questionnaire, and then section-specific findings, respectively.

3.1 Global Results and Recommendations

In this section, we will first address concerns of respondent burden, privacy, and confidentiality pertaining to the overall instrument. Then, we will address problems that apply to multiple questions throughout the questionnaire.

Respondent Burden

Burden was measured subjectively in the cognitive interview, looking for signs of difficulty, frustration, boredom or irritation. Many respondents' comments both during the interviews and during the debriefings suggested that certain aspects of the questionnaire were burdensome. In fact, of the 23 respondents interviewed for this project, only 5 made no comments that might be construed as pertaining to burden. Of the 18 respondents who did note burden in some way, the most common comments respondents made suggested that it was either very difficult or time-consuming to recall dates of stays and/or addresses. Nine respondents made comments indicating their feelings of difficulty about being asked to recall this information. For example, one respondent who commented on this said that if she had known to prepare, she could have sat down with a calendar and tried to figure out where she went all summer. However, in this case, she was trying to recall each and every stay with friends – which proved too difficult for her, and really unnecessary because she did not stay at any one place for more than 5 nights and they were all short stays during her summer vacation. This was a case where we could easily reduce burden by using the 7-night screener that we will discuss in more detail later.

Five respondents mentioned difficulty distinguishing what was meant by “live” versus “stay” and commented about the burden involved in making that judgment (i.e., how long must someone stay at a place to report it to these questions?). Related to this, some respondents noted that we also seemed to be asking about places they visited, which was seen as distinct from places that they lived or stayed (i.e., visiting is reportedly perceived to be for less time than either living or staying somewhere). Particularly during the section of the questionnaire which asked about staying with relatives and friends, several respondents indicated that it was not clear if they should report visits, or only stays when they had no where else to stay. One respondent asked “When you say ‘stay’ do you mean ‘live’ or ‘visit’?” and then said “Initially I interpreted it as spending any amount of time there,’ but when I think about it, it sounds like you’re implying ‘live there.’ In terms of the Census, you’d be more interested if I lived there or not as opposed to if I popped in there for a night.” You can see that respondents are presuming what kind of information the Census Bureau would be interested in. They may also be taking cues from the follow-up questions that ask for dates that they “lived or stayed” at the place, perhaps implying that these should be longer-term stays than just a night or two away.

One particularly interesting interview was conducted during which we asked a respondent to report on his living situation as of a year prior, the year surrounding April 1, 2008, as opposed to April 1, 2009. The interview was conducted in this way because during testing we were made aware that the actual questionnaire might need to be fielded a year later than originally anticipated.⁵ Thus, changes were made to one interview to test what effects, if any, would be had on asking respondents about their living situations over a year ago. The respondent had trouble recalling dates as well as addresses of the places he stayed in 2008. At the end of the interview, he suddenly realized that he had forgotten to tell us about a two-to-three-month stay he had in the spring of 2008. Though this was only done in one interview, we concluded that asking about living situations over a year ago might be subject to more error.

Privacy Concerns

For the purpose of this study, we define privacy concerns as concerns over whether or not the asking entity (the Census Bureau) has the right to ask for the type of information that we are asking for. If a respondent feels as though the Census Bureau does not have the right to know this information, he or she may feel as if their privacy was violated. Of the twenty-three respondents interviewed, six explicitly expressed privacy concerns with regard to questions they were asked as part of the interview (5 others expressed some concern, but to a lesser degree). The majority of the concerned respondents were troubled by providing information about other people, especially children and significant others, but some were also concerned with divulging what they considered to be personal details about themselves. Most of those who expressed privacy concerns felt that certain questions, such as the names of other people they stayed with and the relationships between those people, were an invasion of their privacy and inappropriate as part of a census. For instance, a respondent who was asked a series of questions about her husband stated,

“...I found it awkward to be answering questions about my significant other and where he was and what he did. I would almost feel like maybe you are a private investigator rather than counting heads, which is my sense of what the Census Bureau does. Where was he? Who was he with? What were the dates? It sounded intrusive. It felt intrusive.”

Another respondent also felt that the questions she was asked were not reflective of those she expected to encounter in a census. She noted, “I mean it feels a bit invasive, it feels like, it’s not really to do with where they’re living, this is more personal than that.”

Additionally, though some respondents expressed concerns about providing detailed information about a close family member, some also felt hesitant to provide even basic information, such as names and addresses, of more distant family. A woman who had visited her sister in another state was asked to provide her sister’s address and the names of the family members who lived there. She had reservations about this request, and during the debriefing she confided, “That felt bad. Giving information on my sister’s home and kids... I think that doesn’t feel right to give somebody else’s personal information.”

⁵ This would have been for 2010 testing only. If fielded in the 2020 Census, it would likely occur in the fall of the census year.

When considering the statement above, it is particularly important to note this respondent's concern with providing information about children. No other respondents in this study expressed this concern for themselves, but another respondent seemed to be aware that providing information about children might be uncomfortable for some people. She denied having any concerns about the questions herself but said, "Maybe when it's [a question] about an adult it's not as bad, but maybe when people ask questions about kids, you know they might have a bigger concern." Thus, researchers should be mindful of the fact that asking questions about children may cause some respondents to become uncomfortable.

Finally, though respondents disliked the idea of providing information about other people, including children and significant others, some were also concerned with providing what they considered personal information about themselves. Again, most of these concerns stemmed from the fact that respondents felt the questions asked of them were inappropriate for a census. One young woman noted,

"You ask me whether or not I'm staying with my parents, or with my boyfriend. That's personal information. If it's in a mandatory thing, I think that would bother me. I think you would probably get people lying if they didn't want to answer it...if my government calls me and says, "You have to do this; tell me, did you sleep over at your boyfriend's house?" I would be upset that I was asked that question. I may or may not tell the truth; I don't know. It seems like a funny thing for the government to have on record."

One respondent who was separated from his wife and in the process of finalizing a divorce felt uncomfortable providing the name of his soon to be ex-wife, as well as the name and address of a more recent ex-girlfriend. He declined to provide the information the interviewer requested and said, "...You know, if it was a current girlfriend, maybe, but that's something that's long passed. It's just not really relevant. I don't think...I don't consider that public information." Another respondent mentioned an illness (possibly mental) that her daughter had that led her to stay somewhere else. This respondent was very uncomfortable with the questions surrounding this stay. Thus, researchers should be aware that certain questions may lead some respondents to feel they are being asked to provide sensitive information about their personal lives, and should consider the possibility that respondents may decline to answer a particular question or potentially provide false information.

Interestingly, on the other side of the spectrum, some respondents did not mind the line of questioning at all. One respondent said that she thinks of the Census Bureau "kind of almost like the tax people" and expects questions like this.

Confidentiality Concerns

For this study, we define confidentiality concerns as any concern that a respondent might have that his or her personal information has been inappropriately shared with another individual or entity. As previously mentioned, our last study in this series generated significant confidentiality concerns (Childs, et al., 2009). The TCFU approach tested here was less likely to generate confidentiality concerns. However, this test has the important limitation that these cases were not "real" duplicates in the census, or a census test. These respondents did not have the opportunity to have the same confidentiality concerns that were seen in the previous test. Therefore, we cannot sufficiently address confidentiality concerns in this test, and that remains to be seen in the 2010 qualitative interviewing test.

A confidentiality-related issue that frequently arose was reported suspicion about providing information over the telephone. The respondent above who told us that it “doesn’t feel right to give somebody else’s personal information,” continued her statement, saying, “I gave it to you ‘cause I have a relationship with you now, but I probably wouldn’t want to do it on the phone.” Another respondent noted, “I think that a phone call like that could make a person feel suspicious of a caller,” while yet another who was asked to provide her parents’ names and address said, “That question was okay for here, but if someone had really called me on the phone I don’t know that I would have given...I wouldn’t have been that specific.”

Since the name of the Census Bureau call center does not always show up on respondents’ caller IDs, we would expect that some respondents would be skeptical of unidentified callers and their motives. After all, as one respondent noted, “Anyone can call and say, ‘I’m so-and-so from the U.S. Census Bureau.’ ” One respondent seemed particularly concerned about what would come up on caller ID if the Census Bureau called him. This seemed to factor heavily as to whether or not he would answer the call.

Challenging Coverage Situations

As a result of the way we recruited our purposive sample, we had a priori knowledge of the situations that we interviewed. We had independent knowledge (of somewhat differing levels of detail) of the living situations of each person interviewed. In all cases, the interview successfully extracted the addresses that we expected. However, we will highlight the few places where reported patterns of stay did not match what was known about the case. In these situations, we do not think it was anything about the questionnaire or the interview that necessarily caused the mis-reporting, but rather that the situations are challenging generally.

The most drastic of these cases was one case that was recruited because of personal knowledge of the researcher that it was a joint custody case, but the joint custody situation was not fully reported in the interview. The respondent did report both addresses (the former and the current), but the second address was reported only as a place that the respondent and her son visit occasionally, not as her (and her son’s) current address, as was known through personal knowledge. During the debriefing, when asked about the sensitivity of these questions, she reported that if someone thought it was not any of the Census Bureau’s business, they simply would not tell the Census Bureau about it. Interestingly, this is, in fact, how it seems that she reported.

The next case is not a misreport, but illustrates an interesting situation, nonetheless. The respondent was staying with her parents to care for her father for part of the year following a serious health problem. From the end of April until the interview day (towards the end of September) she had spent nearly every night with her parents, helping her mother take care of her father. She owns a home nearby where she otherwise lives. She is in a situation, that had it happened prior to Census Day, she could have been counted at both places. She was temporarily staying with her parents, for a somewhat indefinite stay, but she had a permanent place elsewhere. She reported dates of stay at her parents' house from the end of April to the present, going back and forth and spending most of the time there, but not around April 1, Census Day, which preceded the health problem. She reported being at her home from January 1 until the date in late April, and then "sporadically" since then. She reported being at her home "half the time," and that she was there on April 1st. She would be coded correctly based on these reports, but she was very hesitant to report that she was staying with her parents that much. It was a somewhat sensitive situation in that she wanted to ensure that she was recorded at her own house, and not at her temporary stay with her parents.

3.2 Survey-Wide Question Wording

This section provides findings and recommendations that apply to multiple sections throughout the questionnaire.

Reference Period

The reference period in this test was 2009. In the TCFU questionnaire that will be tested in 2010, the reference period will be the calendar year, 2010.

Throughout the questionnaire, there were many instances where reading the year within the question text was optional— so the interviewer could decide whether or not it was necessary to repeat the year. During the interviews we discovered that if the year was left out of any particular question, the respondent sometimes asked what the time period was, or responded in such a way that it was evident he or she was thinking of a different time period. For this reason, we recommend using the reference period (i.e., "During 2009") as required text (instead of optional text) in every question about different places to stay. We did this in some interviews during the testing, and it did not seem to be overly redundant or burdensome.

One respondent reported a brief stay with friends over Christmas of the previous year, 2008. While trying to come up with the exact dates, she and her husband realized it was outside the reference period. It should be noted, in this case both the respondent and her husband were present and answering questions together, possibly making the task easier than completing it alone.

While reviewing the summaries of the cognitive interviews, it became apparent that the questionnaire uses slightly different terminology throughout the questionnaire to indicate how short of a stay should be mentioned. At various points in the questionnaire are the phrases "even if you have only stayed with someone on weekends, for a few weeks, or off-and-on throughout the year," "even for just one night or on the weekend," and "even if just on weekends." As mentioned in the section on respondent burden, because the respondent does not necessarily know the intent of these questions, he or she may construe his or her own meaning at each of these references. One respondent reported no to the question about staying with her boyfriend, even if just on weekends, because she reportedly does not often stay on weekends, and only stays for one night at a time when she does stay. She had interpreted the series to be asking if you stayed 2 or more nights in a row at another place. We recommend choosing a common phrase to use throughout the questionnaire.

Gathering the Dates

Tested Questions

Throughout the questionnaire, we used the question shown in Figure 2 to gather dates of stay at each address, as well as some information on the person's pattern of stay. This basic question structure was used in the 2006 Census Coverage Measurement Person Followup.

Findings

A number of problems were noted with this structure. First, it attempts to gather dates as well as patterns of movement. This is difficult to accomplish with one question. Instead, we recommend scripting several questions to accomplish each of these tasks.

Another, related, difficulty with these questions is that it is not always easy (or possible) for respondents to provide exact dates and patterns of movement. If the person moved, then they could often provide exact, or at least approximate dates. If a person goes back and forth between places regularly, then they can often report where they spend most of their time. They can often report which days of the week they spent at the address. If they do not visit the place regularly, but, for example, occasionally visit on the weekends or visited one or two times in the past year, these questions are a little more difficult.

Particularly with “back and forth” or “cycle” situations, the interviewer may have to decipher what the respondent says to match the response categories provided in these questions. For example, in a second home situation, when asked “During 2009, when did you live or stay at that place?” One respondent first replied “It’s been 40 times. Every weekend...And then plus some days.” The interviewer clarified “Okay, so throughout the whole year? From January?” The respondent confirmed. The interviewer further clarified, “And then do you go back-and-forth between here and there?” The respondent confirmed. Then the interviewer asked about whether they spent most of the time, half of the time or less than half of the time at that place. The respondent replied with “40 percent of the time” and the interviewer further clarified that it was mostly on the weekends. The interviewer marked “Saturday” and “Sunday” initially, but in the debriefing the respondent revealed that it was usually “Friday through Monday” but not every single week, so was not equivalent to 4/7 days all year. This illustrates the type of probing and clarification that interviewers need to be able to do to gather all the relevant information for these questions. It also may suggest that the questions need to be reworded, but we recommend iterative cognitive testing to develop and test such wording, as no clear recommendations were apparent.

Another example of necessary probing is one case where the respondent simply answered “just last weekend.” The interviewer further probed to find out that she stays 3-4 days every 6 weeks or so. Last weekend was simply the most recent visit.

The lack of a notes space for this question could be a problem. Especially in complex situations, it may be difficult for the interviewer to accurately capture the situation through the available fields. In one example of a commuter worker who had several places to stay throughout the year, of his primary address, he said “Friday through Sunday from...April to December and I was there the whole year for January, February and most of March.” It would be difficult to capture these two distinct patterns in the available response fields.

Another finding was that sometimes when an alternate address is generated to one of these questions, it is not a place that the respondent identifies as a place he or she lived or stayed. Rather, they identify it as a place they visited.

Testing also showed that while respondents may not know exact dates of stay, they can often report some of the information, like months of stay or whether the person stayed there most of the time, half of the time or less than half of the time.

Interestingly, the 2006 Census Coverage Measurement Person Followup also found problems with this structure, and revised the form to something similar to that recommended for this form.

Recommendations

Several recommendations were described above:

- Script several questions to gather dates and patterns of movement between places.
- Include the option to report stays off and on throughout the year.
- Customize the follow-up questions to include questions about visiting when this would likely be the case.
- Train interviewers on how to probe and complete the “dates” questions given the type of information that respondents provide as responses.

Additional recommendations for this question series were as follows:

- Revise gray printed MM/DD/2010 because it was hard to write over it (See Figure 2).
- Add probes when respondents answer that they don’t know either of the sub-questions in the revised questions.
- Implement two fields for dates of stay, to be able to record more than one stay.

Figures 3 and 4 show the revised question series for two different situations – one in which the respondent has reported “living” somewhere else, and another where the respondent may only think of themselves as visiting the other place.

Place Stayed On April 1

Tested Question

There is a question that asks where the person was staying on April 1: “Were you/Was he/she there on Wednesday, April 1st?” This question is necessary in situations where the person spends exactly half of the time at two different places, or has no place where they spend more time than anywhere else.

Findings

In most cases, respondents could not remember exactly where they stayed on April 1.⁶ Those who could answer the question easily were people who did not have many other places to stay. For those who regularly cycled between two places, sometimes they could figure it out based on day of the week (if they often spent weekends one place and weekdays at another place).

⁶ Recall that the interviews occurred in September, roughly 6 months after the date in question.

In a couple of instances, the person reported being at two places on April 1 because they woke up at one address, but spent the night at a different address. This poses an interesting problem if the person split his or her time exactly equally between the places.

In a number of cases, the interviewer missed this question in the sequence. Therefore, we recommend making this question more prominent on the revised form. This recommendation was accepted and can be seen in the revised form in Appendix B.

Several respondents asked or expressed curiosity about why we kept asking about April 1. We recommend mentioning in the introduction, or at least providing interviewers with the information concerning why April 1 is of interest.

Recommendations

- Revise the location of the question to make it more prominent.
- Provide the interviewer with information on why we ask about April 1.

Names of Other People at Address

Tested Questions

We tested several different questions about other people at the alternative addresses:

- “Who usually lives at that place?” was tested to find the names of the other people who would likely be associated with that address.
- “Who else stays at that place?” was tested to see if other household members might also have been duplicated at this place.
- “Does name sometimes stay at/use that address?” was aimed at finding out if specific people in the respondent’s household could have also been duplicated at this place.

Findings

The first question, about usual residents at the other place, sometimes generated privacy concerns. In some cases, respondents felt uncomfortable providing information on someone else’s house. Additionally, sometimes this was reportedly perceived as personal information – especially in the case of the respondent who reported the home he previously lived in with his ex-wife – her name was considered too private to report. This was also an area of concern for a respondent reporting on her husband’s other place to stay for work. She felt as if we were asking if he stayed with another woman while away at work.

The other questions had similar concerns. Though they were aimed at gathering information on other of the respondent’s household members who may have also stayed at the address, they were also seen as rather intrusive by some respondents.

The questions that did not use the name fills (the first two above) often yielded descriptors of the people stayed with (e.g., “my mother and father”) rather than names and the interviewer had to probe for names. One respondent mentioned that the question about the address was in terms of relationships – e.g., “did you stay with your parents or brother or sister?” – so it made sense to respond in those terms.

The other potential confusion that surfaced with these questions is that when the respondent has moved from the place in question, these questions are asked in the present tense – about who stays and lives there. If household has moved out, we are really interested in who was there when they were there, not who lives there now. Sometimes respondents were not sure which we meant. Additionally, if the place was a hotel or a vacation home, these questions make little sense.

The question that named respondents' household members asking, if they also stayed at the address (the last question above), had an additional problem. This question was very awkward when posed about ex-spouses, for example, asking if a respondent still sometimes stays at his ex-wife's house (along with their children in joint custody) and if another respondent's female roommate sometimes stays at his ex-wife's house or at an ex-girlfriend's house. One of the respondents in a joint custody situation answered with an expletive, "H___ no!" that he did not stay with his ex-wife. In his case, the ex-wife was remarried.

The last question also has the word "use," which was intended to gather instances where the person does not stay at or live at the address, but rather only uses it as a mailing address or for official purposes. For example, sometimes parents use a different relative's address to get their child into a more desired school. In such cases, one might expect that the child could easily be duplicated. Though we tried to recruit for this situation, we did not find any respondents in this situation. For other respondents the "use" terminology sounded a bit odd.

Recommendations

Because some respondents found the use of the term "use" odd, we recommended only using it only for questions about school (or college) and omitting it from all other questions.

Because of the additional concerns with the last question, and to make the questions consistent, we recommended only asking a single question about each alternate address:

- What are the names of the people who usually live at that place?

If respondents feel uncomfortable answering this question, they can refuse or decline to answer.

Gathering Addresses

Tested Questions

The tested questionnaire had typically three to four other address questions on each page, with the capability of gathering two addresses per page. See figure 5 for an example.

Findings

This structure was problematic for two reasons. The first is that the follow-up address questions could not be customized because we did not know exactly what question we were following up. Second, if the respondent had two or more addresses in any one category, then the interviewer ran out of room on that page of the form. For these reasons, we recommend having each type of address on a separate page, with the opportunity to gather four addresses for each topic (to make the form as thorough as possible without being overwhelming). Four addresses can fit on the front and back of a single sheet of paper.

There were a couple of occasions where the lack of organized address-gathering led a respondent to omit addresses where he or she stayed during the year. There was a period of the year that was unaccounted for, sometimes the period surrounding Census Day, and the interviewer did not even realize this until reviewing the form after the interview was complete. For this reason, we recommend that if there is more than one place for any one topic, would be helpful to get them in chronological order- what is the address of the place you stayed first during 2009? This was implemented for questions where it was logical – like the question on moving. Additionally, on other questions, after gathering an address, we scripted a customized follow-up question asking if there were any other places like this (see the “f” questions in Section F in Attachment B).

In a few interviews, the respondent kept mentioning the same address over and over to multiple questions – e.g., to the questions on parents, brother/sister and vacation to report the same stay. We recommend making it clear to both the interviewer and the respondent that after an address is reported on, it does not need to be reported on again. To do this, we recommend reminding the respondent (and the interviewer) periodically that they should report addresses “other than addresses that I’ve already recorded” or “that you’ve already mentioned.”

Another critical problem was found in a couple of interviews where we did not get dates of stay at the address about which we started the interview (ADDRESS A, for example). If ADDRESS A was not the primary or current address of the person, sometimes ADDRESS A did not come up at any of the other questions, and dates of stay were not inquired about. For example, in one interview, we were asking a father who had part-time custody about his child’s address. He reported that the child’s current and primary address was his mother’s address. When asked if the child stayed with another parent, he reported that his child stayed with his mother (at the already provided address). These questions did not elicit detailed information about when the child stayed with the father at the address where we began the inquiry.

The TCFU probed about dates of stay for the current address last, to try to ensure that we gathered information on the current address. This was often perceived as repetitive, even though it sometimes was not. Respondents (and even interviewers) often thought we had covered this already in the interview and sometimes it was skipped over for that reason. For these reasons, we recommended asking about all known addresses first, before moving on to alternate addresses. See Section C, D, and E in the revised form in Appendix B.

Finally, many of these other address questions used a complex sentence structure, e.g., “During 2009, have you/has NAME moved?” This was found to be awkward and sometimes difficult for respondents to understand. In addition, during testing and analysis there was some uncertainty as to whether the survey would actually field during 2010 or 2011, using a reference period of 2010. In all instances, we recommended that the sentence structure be simplified to ask “During 2009, did you/NAME move?” This would satisfy the concern that if the survey fielded in 2011, the question would not suffice.

Recommendations

To summarize the recommendations mentioned above:

- Place each type of address on a separate page, with the opportunity to gather four addresses for each topic.
- For topics where there were likely more than one address to discuss, like moving, ask for the addresses in chronological order. For example, “what is the address of the place you stayed first during 2009?”
- Additionally, on other questions, after gathering an address, ask a customized follow-up question asking if there were any other places like this (see the “f” questions in Section F in Attachment B).
- Ask about all known addresses first, including current address, before asking about alternative addresses.
- Simplify sentence structure whenever possible.

The “7-Night” Rule

Tested Questions

The questionnaire implemented a 7-night rule for situations where we believed that it was very likely for someone to have stayed at that type of place for 1-2 nights, but not likely to have been counted there. Examples of this are vacations and conferences. If the person answered “yes” that they had stayed at one of these types of places, the next question asked if the person stayed there “more than 7 nights in the past year,” as shown in Figure 6. If the person answered “no” or “don’t know” to the earlier question, then they were not asked this 7-night screener.

13a. For that/those reason(s), did you/he/she stay at any one place more than 7 nights in the past year?
 Yes – Go to A9
 No – Go to 14
 DK – Go to 14

Findings

The consistent problem that came up with this screener question was whether it meant 7 consecutive nights or cumulative nights. In some cases that would make a difference in how the respondent would answer.

In addition, if we need to probe for additional places that fall into this type of question, we need to remind the respondent of the 7-night rule.

Recommendations

We recommend clarifying whether the 7 nights meant consecutive or cumulative nights. The team decided to clarify to “7 nights total” – this can be seen in Figure 7. Also shown in Figure 7 is the probe for additional places with the 7-night reminder.

13.1. For (that/those) reason(s) (specify as needed), did (you/he/she) stay at any one place for more than 7 nights total in 2010? <input type="checkbox"/> Yes – Continue to 13.2a <input type="checkbox"/> No – Skip to 14 (next page) <input type="checkbox"/> DK – Skip to 14 (next page)	13.2f. Was there another place where (you/he/she) stayed more than 7 nights total for the reason(s) mentioned before (specify as needed)? <input type="checkbox"/> Yes – Continue to 13.3a <input type="checkbox"/> No – Skip to 14 (next page) <input type="checkbox"/> DK – Skip to 14 (next page)

Based on the findings of this study, we also recommended implementing the 7-night rule for more questions where we found it overly burdensome to ask for each address where the person stayed. We recommended this for the Job Series, stays with friends, as well as any “Other” catch-all questions. This recommendation was implemented as well and appears in Appendix B.

3.3 Specific-Section Findings

This section provides findings specific to certain sections of the questionnaire (but not to the overall questionnaire). They are organized by order in which they appear in the questionnaire in Appendix A.

Introduction

Introducing the Survey

Tested Questions

The beginning of the survey progresses through the following sequence of questions:

- Verify we have reached the correct household (using last names of household members).
- Ask to speak with one of the adult duplicates, or ask to speak with an adult member of the household who can answer questions about the child duplicates.
- Provide the introduction to the survey (including legally required statements).

After verifying that we have reached the correct people, the survey verifies that we have reached the correct address. In production, the question wording will depend on whether or not the phone numbers matched between the two addresses where people were duplicated. The tested question wording is as follows:

- If the duplicates have different phone numbers → “Have I reached (address)?”
- If the duplicates have the same phone number → “Have I reached (address1) or (address2)?”

See Figures 8 and 9 for the tested question wording.

Findings

One respondent answered the very first question in a misleading way that would have prematurely ended the interview. She had recently gotten married, therefore said she would say that we had not reached the MADIEN NAME household, since it was the MARRIED NAME household. In her case, she had moved out of both addresses where she was “duplicated” for purposes of this test. She lived at ADDRESS 1 by herself, and then moved into ADDRESS 2, which was a temporary place where she first lived with her husband until she could move into ADDRESS 3 where she currently was. This case is particularly complex because her name changed when she got married, which occurred between ADDRESS 1 and ADDRESS 2. In her situation, the problem could have been avoided by first asking to speak with her, because she would have answered correctly to the question “May I speak with MAIDEN NAME?” In this case, she took the question of the household name in a very traditional manner (using the husband’s name) and thus answered incorrectly for our purposes. Because of confidentiality concerns, however, the team decided not to pursue the change to ask directly for the person first.

Another respondent mentioned that the introduction used “I” and “we” more than she expected, and that she would be more comfortable with the “Census Bureau” because that would sound more official and would raise less privacy concerns for her (while the Census Bureau may have the right to ask about these things, the interviewers, personally, do not).

Some respondents reported not being sure if the mandatory statement meant it was mandatory that they do the survey or if it was mandatory that the Census Bureau conduct the survey. Respondents mentioned that stating that cooperation is “just” important must mean that it is not mandatory. If possible, we recommended separating these concepts.

The term “mandatory” did stand out to many respondents, some mentioning that it bothered them that it was mandatory, but others just noting it as a fact. One respondent insinuated that she would be somewhat frustrated, but the fact that it was mandatory would keep her from hanging up the phone.

Another respondent seemed to be concerned because he didn’t understand the OMB number and the statement about it. He commented, “Do I have to have a lawyer there to...Big deal! I don’t know what that is.” Although we realize that we cannot make many changes to the legally required statements, we wanted to note these sources of confusion.

We interviewed two cases where we simulated phone matches. In the remaining interviews, we probed in the debriefing about how the respondent would react if we had used the phone match question wording. However, in many cases, this was completely artificial because the phone numbers would never match (e.g., between a respondent and her parent’s addresses, or between a primary residence and a rental property). In some situations, respondents reported that this would make them very uncomfortable, but in almost all of the situations, we would not expect the phone numbers to really match. For example, in a joint custody case where the parents have split up, mom’s census return phone number should not ever match dad’s census return phone number. Also, any time that a person is staying part of the time at their own place and part of the time with someone else, we would not expect the phone numbers to match (e.g., girlfriend/boyfriend cases, commuter worker staying with relatives).

In the cases where it would be reasonable to hypothesize that the phone number could match, respondents expressed no concerns with the question asking which address we had reached. Interestingly, one respondent indicated that he expected for a landline number that the Census Bureau would have access to what address matched with what landline phone number, but he might expect such a question on a cell phone since they are not necessarily geographically-anchored. Those who did express some concern in the hypothetical situations reported that they would be less concerned if we revealed that we had the same phone number recorded for both addresses. This would explain to them how we had both addresses. We recommend having an explanation as an interviewer note so that if the respondent asks or expresses concern, the interviewer can inform them.

Because of the possibility of a false match where the people and the phone number match coincidentally, we probed hypothetically about what the respondent would think if we asked about an unknown address (e.g., Have I reached YOUR ADDRESS or UNKNOWN ADDRESS?) they responded in many different ways. Some mentioned that it would not bother them, they would just think it was peculiar; some mentioned that it would raise suspicions about the call – like we were fishing for information; and others mentioned that it would be like a credit check situation where you are asked which of the four things are you associated with. However, despite these differing levels of concern, we do not suspect that we would run into situations where the strength of the match between people is high enough to indicate that they are a suspected duplicate AND the phone number matches between units if the people are not truly duplicated at both addresses.

Recommendations

Reduce the use of “I” and “we” statements in the introduction.

We recommend further testing of these legal statements with the legal and policy offices involved.

We do not recommend any changes to the questions about verifying the address at this time, but we recommend training the interviewers to explain that the phone numbers matched between addresses if the respondent expresses concern.

Recognizing the Other Address

Tested Questions

The question shown in Figure 10 is asked about the alternate address when the phone number matches and the respondent selects which of the two addresses we have reached him or her (or provides a 3rd address where we have reached him or her).

3. Do you recognize <ADDR1>?
 Yes – Can you tell me about that place? Is it, for example, one that <your household>/<you/names> moved from, a second home, a relative’s home, a place for school, or some other place?
Read as necessary:

 A place for health care purposes?
 A place to care for someone else?
 Something else?, please specify: _____
 DK – Go to B1
 No – Go to INTERVIEW CHECK ITEM
 DK – Go to INTERVIEW CHECK ITEM

Findings

One of the respondents in the phone number match condition responded to this item “um, yes...I mean I recognized it as my parents’ address. Do I recognize it as my own? No I don’t. I don’t list that as my address.” For this reason, we recommended changing the terminology to “Are you familiar with ADDRESS?” The other respondent in this condition had no difficulty with this question, but we suspect the revision will clarify for anyone who might have difficulty. This recommendation was accepted.

In the cases where the phone numbers matched, we tested a very abbreviated version of the questionnaire. After the respondent verified that she knew both addresses, we asked how often she stayed at each address in 2009.

Recommendations

We recommend changing the terminology from “recognizing” to “being familiar with.”

Section Introductions

Tested Wording

In addition to the survey introductions, there were also introductions to each section. The purpose of each introduction was to prime the respondent for the type of questions they were about to be asked. In addition, when there were multiple duplicates in the household, the introductions helped serve as breaks from the questions, to help the respondent realize that questions are moving from one duplicate person to another duplicate person in the household. See Figure 11 for an example:

Children often have more than one place to stay. The next series of questions asks about the child/children in this household and where they might have stayed this year, that is, during 2009. Please say "yes" even if the child only stayed at that place on the weekends, for a few weeks, or off and on throughout the year. Let's start with NAME.

Findings

Since each person gets a customized set of sections, sometimes the interviewer had to read the same paragraph introductions multiple times within the same interview (for different people). This was burdensome for the interviewers and respondents; however, respondents reported liking the transitions in between sections in general because it helped them know what was coming.

Recommendations

The team constructed shortened versions of the transitions that can be printed if there are multiple suspected duplicates in the household. These can be seen in Attachment C.

Moving Questions

Tested Questions

The questions for adult duplicates started out asking about moves, because this is suspected to be the most likely reason that an adult would be duplicated in the census. The question series first asked if the person moved, then if the person moved once or more than once, and finally how many places the person lived, not counting the current address. See the series in Figure 12 below.

Findings

This series proved difficult for respondents. Respondents got confused about whether they were counting number of moves or number of addresses. In addition, if they had reported more than one additional address, it was not clear in what order they should report the addresses. In one instance, this problem seemed to have caused a respondent to leave out an address.

Recommendations

We recommended simplifying this series by asking how many addresses that person has had other than those already mentioned. Then we recommend asking “What was the first address?” or “What was the address of the first place?” and then, “What was the address of the next place?”

The revised form does not ask for number of addresses, but rather asks for all addresses in chronological order, and allows the respondent to use a short-cut if the address has already been reported. Figure 13 shows the revised series.

College Questions

Tested Questions

The initial college question asked “During 2009, Have you/Has NAME attended college, grad school or any training program?”

Findings

Respondents often keyed into the last part of this question, which asked about a different type of situation – training, as opposed to college. One respondent responded, “That’s a yes and no answer. I’ve taken training through an employer, but as far as any external training through a learning institution, the answer would be ‘no.’” This question was particularly difficult for this respondent because he was a trainer for his job, and first was trained to be a trainer.

Recommendations

Since we have another question aimed at less common living situations that also mentions training, we recommend removing training from this question. In addition, the other living situations question implements a 7-nights or more rule, that is likely relevant for training situations.

In addition, we recommend writing out “graduate school” to draw more attention as well as being more formal and grammatically correct.

Job Questions

Tested Questions

The job series started by asking, “During 2009, have you had a job?” In crafting these questions, the team decided to ask first if the person had a job during 2009, and if so, if they stayed somewhere else. The intent of this was to not condition the respondent to say “no” to every question, like appears to sometimes happen in the other coverage surveys. Other questions in the adult series work the same way, asking if the person has attended college, or is in the military, then follows up with a question about having another place to live.

4. During 2009, Have you/Has NAME had a job? <input type="checkbox"/> Yes – Go to 4a → <input type="checkbox"/> No – Go to 5 <input type="checkbox"/> DK – Go to 5	4a. --	--	---

Findings

However, it seems that respondents are already conditioned to say “no” to this question series. At least two respondents initially said “no” to this question and then corrected themselves to say “yes.” Since having a job is the most likely situation of those asked about, we recommend moving it earlier in the question series.

We noted that if a respondent reports that someone stayed in multiple hotels for a job, they usually did not know the address of each hotel – particularly for a proxy report. In addition, we came upon a situation that was perceived to violate privacy in relation to this question that could have been avoided with the 7-night screener. A respondent reported that her husband did stay away for his job – in a hotel in Florida for about 6 nights. What she could report about the address got recorded and then the interviewer proceeded to ask who else stays at that place. The respondent later reported that she thought this was too intrusive – essentially asking whom her husband was staying with at the hotel in Florida. This awkward situation could have been avoided with the 7-night screener.

Recommendations

We recommend moving the “job” series earlier in the questionnaire. This recommendation was inadvertently not implemented in the final questionnaire.

We also recommend implementing the 7-night screener on other places for jobs. This was implemented and can be seen in Figure 15.

Seasonal Residence and Another Residence Questions

Tested Questions

There are two questions aimed at other residences that the respondent may own or rent. These questions are aimed at gathering information about other places a person might own, thus might have their name attached to, even if they have not stayed there this year. One reason we suspect that people could be duplicated and not report it to other interviews is that they do not know they were duplicated. This could easily happen if a proxy interview occurs at the rental property and the proxy reports the names of the owners instead of the renters (or failed to record the housing unit as vacant).

First, the questionnaire asks, “During 2009 have you had a seasonal or vacation home?” The second question asks, “Have you had another residence that you owned or rented?”

Findings

In one seasonal home case, the respondent asked “Have we had one or acquired one? We have one in 2009. We have one. We do currently have one.” This respondent seemed to stumble on the reference period or the syntax in this question – it is past tense and asks in 2009, if the person “has had” a seasonal or vacation home. On dates of stay for this question, the respondent provided months in which they had stayed there, and that it was for short stays. She gave a detailed narrative, providing more useful information than could be captured on the form. The vacation home is really a rental property that is rented in the summer months and used as a vacation home in the off-season. She provided exact months when it is rented and when it is used as a family vacation home. This amount of detail would be lost in the interview because there is not a notes space on this page.

These questions performed as intended – generating responses when the researcher knew that the respondent had such a place. It caused a bit of a pause for respondents, because the intent of this question is different from other questions – about a rental property, rather than a place they might have gone. However, no one seemed to have difficulty.

The follow-up question asked, “Did you have one place or more than one place?” One respondent started counting the number of places he stayed during the year at this point, rather than the number of places he owned or rented. For this reason, we recommended that each of these follow-up questions be tailored to the type of place in question. This recommendation was implemented in the final form.

In one case, the respondent had three rental properties (in addition to a vacation home). There was not room on the form to list all three, so two were written in the margins. Allowing more space on the form so that each topic can gather four addresses would resolve this problem.

Recommendations

For the final form, ensure there are adequate notes spaces.

Tailor the follow-up questions to the type of places in question, for example, “Did you have another seasonal or vacation home?”

Boyfriend/Girlfriend Questions

Tested Questions

We tested two versions of a question asking about stays with a romantic partner. For younger adults, we asked if they stayed with “a boyfriend, girlfriend, or significant other, even if just on weekends.” For older adults, we asked if they stayed with “a companion or significant other.”

Findings

The only cases in which it was seen as sensitive or offensive was if someone was married. One respondent reported that they heard the question as asking “is your husband cheating on you?” Only one or two respondents seemed offended at the question, but several others made jokes about being asked if they or their spouse stayed with a boyfriend or girlfriend. Though this was sometimes problematic for married people, one respondent who had been married earlier in the year, but divorced now, actually did have another place to stay with a girlfriend. A couple of newly married respondents thought that it was asking if they had stayed with their significant other somewhere prior to getting married. This shows the complication with figuring out how to filter people out of this question, if we decided to do that.

One suggestion to alleviate the sensitivity for married people was to include “friends” and/or “spouses” in this question; however, we are concerned that doing so would take the focus off of romantic relationships and could cause respondents to fail to report those kinds of situations. We know that those situations are underreported in our coverage surveys.

The terminology was well understood by respondents. “Boyfriend” and “girlfriend” are terms that the respondents use and understand. “Significant other” was also widely understood as a spouse or long-time romantic companion. One respondent said that they automatically thought the term meant a same-sex partner.

The researchers also probed on other potential terms. The word “partner” was almost unanimously associated with same-sex couples. One respondent said that priming respondents about homosexuality with that term will upset some who are uncomfortable with homosexuality. Also, the idea of “partner” as also meaning “business partner” came up for a few respondents.

Next, we asked about the term “companion.” Respondents had mixed interpretations of this term. Most viewed “companion” as having to do with a non-romantic, platonic, long-term association with someone else. A few mentioned that it brought to mind elderly people. A couple of respondents even said that pets would be included when using the term “companion.”

Recommendations

The team discussed how to deal with the potential sensitivity of asking this question of married people. We thought that asking directly if a person was married might also be seen as invading privacy. Ultimately, the team decided to omit the question if the person was marked as a spouse or unmarried partner on one of the census rosters, or if the person was identified as the householder and had a spouse or unmarried partner, but to otherwise ask the question.

We recommend keeping the terminology in this question consistent and testing it in the next round of testing.

Relatives Questions

Tested Questions

We tested a series of questions on staying with relatives that differed depending on age group. About children, we asked if they stayed with another parent or grandparent or with another relative. For adults, we asked if they stayed with a parent, a son or daughter, a brother or sister or any other relative – recognizing the large age range that this group encompasses and the different types of situations that could be encountered. For seniors, or older adults, we asked if they stayed with a son or daughter, brother or sister, then any other relatives. See these questions in the figures below.

Findings

In several cases, respondents answered affirmatively to visiting parents, adult children and brothers or sisters only to report extremely short stays, including weekend visits. As noted before, it can be burdensome to report an address and dates of stay for everywhere a person stayed for a weekend away or more during a year.

Several respondents also stumbled on the question asking if they stayed with a son or daughter because they do stay with their son or daughter at their primary residence. In most of these cases, their children were young and stayed with them wherever they stayed (other than for work trips).

Recommendations

We recommend considering where and how to apply the 7-night screener for these questions.

Friends Questions

Tested Questions

The final question in the adult and senior series on staying with other people asked about staying with friends – “Have you stayed with any other people, such as friends?”

Findings

This question often gathered affirmative responses and respondents reported wondering if the Census Bureau was really interested in one or two night stays with friends. One respondent reported “yes” to this question, and then when asked for the address said “I have no idea!” and laughed. She reported that she was thinking of occasional weekend visits to many different friends’ houses. Respondents who answered negatively often later admitted that they had stayed a very few nights with friends, but did not think that it was enough to report it at this question.

Recommendations

We recommended screening the “stay with friends” question to more than 7 nights. This recommendation was implemented.

“Other” Questions

Tested Questions

Figure 17 shows the “laundry list” question that is the final set of questions in each of the kids, adults and seniors series. It asks about various situations where someone could possibly be duplicated, though we suspect these are less likely (though certainly possible).

Findings

Because respondents are given so many options to this question, it becomes necessary to remind them which ones they said yes to, if they said yes to multiple items. Otherwise, sometimes respondents forgot to mention each place they were thinking of until further prompting. We recommend asking only about “Training” instead of “Education or training.” This will further distinguish this item from the one on college, and should decrease reporting a single address multiple times (as sometimes occurred in this testing). Some respondents wanted to know if staying at a hotel for a conference or convention “counted,” that is, should they say “yes” if they stayed at a hotel for a conference or convention. Because we do want these stays to go through the 7-night screener, interviewers should be trained to answer affirmatively.

Though this question yielded very few addresses where we suspect a person could be duplicated, in one case it did generate a response that was surprising. The respondent had already reported on three household members, and the interview was going very long by the time she got to her younger child. She did not remember to report, until at this question, that her son had been in a foreign exchange program in France for five months. The probe on “camps or lessons” was where she recalled this information. Though her son would not be duplicated in France, the fact that she failed to remember this five-month stay until this point in the interview is evidence that this “other” series, while often seen as burdensome or superfluous, can yield stays away that might otherwise be forgotten.

The very last question about staying “anywhere else, even for just one night or on the weekend” generated a few comments. One respondent explicitly asked, “Is that a repeat of the previous question from 10 minutes ago?” He was referring to the last question in the friends and relatives series that asked if you stayed anywhere else, such as with a friend. Other respondents reported thinking that this question bordered on ridiculous – particularly if they had stayed at lots of places for one or two nights over the past year. They seemed relieved at the 7-night screener where they could weed-out most of these very short stays.

It is also important to note that this question is intended to gather addresses that have not already been reported. Several respondents mentioned addresses here that had already been recorded. In most cases, the interviewer just verified that they had been recorded and did not attempt to gather any more information.

Recommendations

Our only recommendation for this series was to ensure that interviewers are trained on how to administer it properly.

Children Series

Tested Questions

This section reports on issues particular to the question series for children. This series was fairly effective; in most cases, it gathered the desired information from the respondent. Figure 18 shows the questions asked about suspected duplicate children.

Findings

In a case of joint custody, while the respondent reported the information without any difficulty, during the debriefing he reported that he might feel uncomfortable if someone called asking for all of this information about his children. This respondent, and one other joint custody respondent, during the debriefing upon being directly asked, reported that they thought it would be odd to only ask about their children in an interview. They reported that they would expect to be asked about themselves first, and then their children.

In the third case of joint custody, the respondent made the comment that he and his ex-wife both put both children on all legal forms. He mentioned that this must cause confusion for the Census Bureau. He also spontaneously reported that he thought the goal of this survey was to make sure children were not double counted.

One respondent who received this series for her under-age child (in addition to the questions she received about other household members) stumbled at the question on staying with “a friend, neighbor or legal guardian.” She said “Guardian?? Yeah, yeah, he stays with friends all the time...That’s funny that those go together. I thought ‘how are those even relevant, a legal guardian and a FRIEND? I mean I would think you’d want to know if he was with a legal guardian versus just doing a sleepover. They’re quite different!” Originally, when designing the questionnaire, we thought that collapsing these might make a less sensitive question. This should be further, examined, however, to ensure that it is gathering the appropriate data.

Recommendations

Minor recommendations for this section included omitting the introductory sentence, “Let’s start with name” when there is only one child, or when the interviewer has gotten to the second, or more, child in the household.

Seniors Series

Tested Questions

This section reports on issues particular to the questions for older adults. The series includes a section on other places to stay to receive care or services. While many of these are GQs, some are also HUs. Our goal in this interview is not to determine what type of place it was, but rather to identify the address where the person was duplicated and when they were there. We suspected, and respondents confirmed, that it is not always clear exactly what category each type of facility belongs in. For our purposes, correct identification of the type of facility is not nearly as important as reporting the address of that facility, and dates of stay.

See Appendix A, pages 25-30 for the series asked of seniors in this test.

Findings

We were only able to recruit one respondent to test the HU to HU match Seniors Series.⁷ This respondent had no difficulty with the series, nor did he find any of the questions sensitive or offensive. We were particularly interested in those questions that asked about “receiving care or services.” None of these situations applied to him or his wife, but he was not offended that we asked.

Respondents in this study sometimes needed to report multiple durations of stay, or multiple facilities for each category of type of place. This confirmed the need to have multiple lines for possible addresses for each type of place. It is not uncommon to go from a facility with a higher level of care to one with a lower level of care, or vice versa.

Researchers also noted that it makes little sense to ask who usually lived or stayed at a place like a nursing home or hospital, where the respondent is unlikely to know any other residents.

Recommendation

Allow space to report stays at multiple care facilities.

Not all GQ-HU sections were tested in this test. However, we took what was learned in the sections that were tested and applied them to other sections as applicable.

Findings

Similar to what was noted for seniors' care and services, researchers noted that multiple address lines were needed for each GQ-type question. We saw this with both the rehab/hospital situations as well as the military. Four address lines would have been adequate in all cases in this test.

In the military case, the respondent answered affirmatively to both the question on military barracks and on on-base housing, mentioning deployment to another country. She did not know an address in the other country, but gave the city, country and unit number. The barracks and on-base housing referred to the same address. It seemed as though she did not know the difference between barracks and on-base housing. She also gave the names of two other military bases that he passed through on his way home (for several days to two weeks). She could provide exact dates for these, but did not have addresses. The interviewer ran out of room and began recording information in the margins in a non-sequential order. In addition to the GQ questions, we tested a generic series of other HU address questions. These did not take into account the information that had just been recorded, thus causing this military wife to repeat everything she had already reported to the interviewer.

Two cases reported on elderly people in nursing homes, hospitals and/or rehabilitation centers. In the first case, the wife reported four different places that her husband had stayed while recovering from a serious medical condition. She had a personal calendar that documented all of the dates, which she pulled out and referred to during the interview. In addition, she looked up the address of at least one of the places during the interview. Her only difficulty with the GQ questions series was identifying which type of place each was. She did not know the difference between a nursing home, a rehabilitation facility, a skilled nursing facility, a hospital and a residential treatment facility. The residential treatment facility was the one she was most confused about. Her husband had gone to a rehabilitation facility where he resided for a brief time, and she thought it might count as a residential treatment facility.

When this respondent was asked the generic HU alternate address questions, the researcher noted that it seemed unnecessarily burdensome. First, she laughed at the “other place for school” since her husband is in his 70s. Then, she answered affirmatively to the question on staying with a son or daughter, and had to give that address, though it was only a one-week stay, and then a few weekends. She reported staying with another son or daughter as well, and ended up providing that address since they stayed there for more than 7 nights (though not consecutively). She did mention therapy at the question on training – asking if it counted. The interviewer clarified that it was “other than places we’ve already talked about.”

The second case of hospital/rehab was somewhat simpler, but also noted the burden of the other HU questions. This respondent was reporting for her mother-in-law. She reported staying in a rehab and a hospital. When asked for the address, she gave the address of the rehab. When asked about “any other facility?” she said “no,” despite having reported a hospital stay. The interviewer probed her about that stay to get the address (though she only knew city and state) and dates of stay. This respondent also exhibited some confusion about whether or not to repeat addresses already given in the HU section.

Recommendations

We believe that many of these problems can be remedied with the following solutions:

- Adding four spaces for addresses for each GQ type of place.
- Reminding the respondent not to repeat addresses already mentioned.

- Updating the other questions on other HUs, being clear that they are in addition to addresses already reported. (More on this next).

Based on these three interviews, the team reconsidered what the goal of the HU questions was and decided to simplify this series. People who are suspected GQ-HU duplicates are expected only to match to the expected GQ. If they do not, it is either not a duplicate, or the GQ was misclassified. For this reason, we recommended changing the follow-up questions for all GQ-HU matches to only have 2 other address questions – a very general one on other GQs (this is the question that is asked on other coverage surveys) and a general one on other HUs. See Figures 22 and 23, below.

Proxy interview

We only conducted one interview that was a proxy for someone who had moved out.

Findings

The moved-out proxy interview was interesting for a few reasons. It was the only interview that we conducted over the phone. The researcher noted that because the interview was on the phone, she felt that the respondent was being less precise, and perhaps more rushed than the in-person interviews had been. This was also the only situation where we had also conducted a non-proxy interview with the duplicated person, so we had a standard of comparison for the proxy interview. The situation was that the respondent’s daughter had lived at ADDRESS 1 in the beginning of the year, moved into her residence (ADDRESS 2) temporarily until she and her husband moved to ADDRESS 3. The proxy gave slightly incomplete address information – missing apartment number and ZIP code, and also misreported the dates of stay for the last address by one week. She answered “no” to the question on having a job, because for a period of the year, her daughter did not have a job. However, she has since been employed (but did not have another residence for her job). The proxy also misreported that her daughter had not stayed with a brother or sister. In the self-report interview, the respondent reported spending ten days with her brother. Additionally, the proxy reported no stays with friends, and the self-report reported multiple stays with friends, and listed the address of one. And, finally, the proxy did not report her daughter being away for conferences and conventions (though she asked about it but decided to say “no”) that the self-report did report. Though this is the only situation where we can compare a proxy versus non-proxy report, it does demonstrate the difference in accuracy between the two.

Recommendations

As always, we recommend self-reports over proxy reports.

Hypothetical Questions

Some hypothetical questions were asked of respondents at the end of the interview because some situations were unrepresented in the set of respondents used for this test. Although we recognize that posing these questions in a hypothetical manner is not as useful as testing them on respondents who would actually receive these questions, the results are included here for a suggestion as to how actual respondents would receive these questions.

We began by asking of adults hypothetically what they would think if we asked them if they use services from soup kitchens, mobile food vans, shelters, hotels or motels. Many respondents took issue with these questions, paying special attention to the “soup kitchen” option to discuss the general unease with reporting that they needed this help. Some respondents indicated that this was prying, too nosy, and awkward. Others noted that some people simply would not answer this question truthfully if they did visit a shelter or soup kitchen. They said that some people would be too prideful to admit this given how stigmatized it is socially. One respondent said that many would not want their visit to a shelter to go on record. Said differently, many respondents understood this question to really be asking if the respondent is destitute, or has failed at providing for themselves. In this way, one respondent calls this question “insulting.” Another said that they would simply refuse to answer this question because it crosses the line. Finally, one respondent worried that if someone answered affirmatively to a question about soup kitchens or shelters, they would be worried about what follow-up questions might come next. However, two respondents did recognize in their response that this question might have to do with the government needing to know how much resources to provide, meaning that they viewed this question much more favorably.

Another respondent mentioned that starting with soup kitchens and shelters first, and then asking about hotels and motels last, primes the respondent to think of all of these categories together as having to do with needing help, and thus one would be less likely to answer affirmatively to hotel/motel for the reasons described above. Last, another issue with hotels and motels for one respondent is whether staying at a hotel while on vacation would count in the context of this question.

Another hypothetical question posed to all respondents asked how respondents would react to being asked if they stayed in a group home, residential treatment facility, residential school for people with disabilities, nursing home, assisted living facility, rehabilitation hospital, generalized or specialized hospital, or a skilled nursing facility. Similar to the responses about soup kitchens and shelters, some respondents mentioned that many would simply not want to admit to going to rehab for substance abuse issues because it is socially undesirable to do so. One respondent thought that their answer should be able to differentiate between going to one of these places to visit someone else versus being admitted there yourself.

Then, we asked all respondents what they would think if we asked if they spent even one night in a correctional facility like a jail or prison, a detention center, or even one night under arrest. Again, respondents felt that admitting to going to jail might be socially undesirable. However, some respondents noted that going to jail is different than the previous undesirable answers of soup kitchens and rehab because jail is far less anonymous. This means that they believe that a stay in jail is already part of the government's record, so these respondents said those who did spend time in jail might be more honest given that this is a government survey. Also, one respondent said that the follow-up question about the jail's address would probably be very frustrating because one likely feels uncomfortable about it already and would be unlikely to know the facility's address.

4. Conclusions and Future Research

This round of testing drew heavily on research conducted one year prior (Childs, et al., 2009). In the previous study, the approach to resolve identified duplicates was to explicitly mention to the respondent that someone in the household might have been duplicated in the census. This approach led to significant concerns about confidentiality; that is, that the Census Bureau was giving out information that should not have been shared. This is a concern the Census Bureau takes very seriously because confidentiality concerns can damage the Census Bureau's integrity, and if people do not trust the Census Bureau, data quality decreases.

To respond to this concern a different approach was implemented in the round of testing that is discussed in this paper. Instead of a direct approach, more detailed probing questions were used. Unfortunately, this led not to the confidentiality issues witnessed previously, but instead to privacy concerns. If confidentiality pertains to the Census Bureau sharing information provided too widely, privacy has to do with the Census Bureau asking respondents to provide too much or too detailed information. Many respondents found the questions to be too invasive, especially when asking about children or other households. Related to the privacy concerns is the high degree of respondent burden that the detailed questions caused. Respondents reported finding the questions difficult to answer and too time-consuming. If questions are thought to be too prying, then the Census Bureau risks people refusing to answer specific questions or even the entire questionnaire. Additionally, this could lead to poor public relations for the Census Bureau, which ultimately reduces the quality of the data collected.

Moving forward, the Census Bureau will conduct more research on the TCFU questionnaire, paying close attention to privacy concerns and respondent burden, also keeping in mind the previous concerns regarding confidentiality found in the 2009 test. In 2010, a large-scale cognitive test with "real" computer-identified suspected duplicates from the 2010 Census will be conducted. Approximately 250 TCFU cognitive interviews and an additional 50 semi-scripted qualitative interviews will be conducted with suspected duplicates. This will allow us to investigate privacy and confidentiality concerns in a real-life situation, as opposed to the somewhat contrived situation used for testing here. Based on that research, a plan for testing with suspected duplicates in the 2020 Census will be developed.
