State and Local Agencies Preparing Population Estimates and Projections: Survey of 1975-76

This report presents the results of a mail survey of State and local governmental agencies from December 1975 to the summer of 1976. About 1,500 sets of questionnaires were sent out, attempting to identify those agencies actively involved in the preparation of either current population estimates or population projections.

The survey was intended to cover the work of official State and local governmental agencies making estimates and projections. Estimates data for private agencies are shown only in the few cases where a local chamber of commerce, utility company, or other private agency was a primary source of population estimates for the area. In the case of population projections, however, all private agencies which prepared projections and responded to the survey were included on the projections bibliography.

EVOLUTION OF THE SURVEY

This is the sixth in a series of surveys attempting to periodically inventory the availability of population estimates from State and local government sources. Beginning with a survey of State agencies in 1955, succeeding surveys in 1957-58, 1960, 1965, and 1969 covered an increasingly broad spectrum of agencies. The 1965 survey, which covered 300 State agencies and over 200 local agencies, was the only other survey to also inquire about population projections. By the 1969 survey, the number of State agencies contacted was reduced to 55 (the advent of the Federal-State Cooperative Program for Population Estimates had reduced the need for canvassing of State agencies), and an additional 405 local agencies were contacted. These included city, county, and regional planning agencies, city and county health departments, and the mayors of cities with 50,000 or more population not covered by the earlier-mentioned agencies. The emphasis below the State level was heavily focused on metropolitan areas and large cities.

Conditions in the field of local population estimation and projection have changed drastically since the surveys of the 1960's. The Bureau of the Census has expanded its own estimates program in the 1970's to include the 3,100 counties and 36,000 incorporated places and minor civil divisions (MCD's) for use in Federal general revenue-sharing and other Federal government programs. Similarly, population estimation and projection operations in many States have been expanded under the Federal-State Cooperative Program for Population Estimates (FSCP).¹ The evolution of the FSCP over the last 10 years has had the effect of shifting responsibility for Statewide population estimates activities into the hands of a single agency in each State and has frequently resulted in a considerable broadening of that agency's estimates and projections program.

In Connecticut, Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, and New Jersey, the State FSCP agency now makes annual estimates for all incorporated places and MCD's in the State, as does a non-FSCP agency in Wisconsin. In California, Florida, Louisiana, Oregon, and Washington the State FSCP agency makes annual estimates for all incorporated places. In several of the States these estimates are utilized for State revenue-sharing purposes. The FSCP agencies in the States of California, Florida, Michigan, Oregon, and Washington have active programs assisting localities in the taking of censuses which may be directly utilized for State funding purposes or incorporated into the State's estimates series.

Such activity in the preparation of population estimates from the State and Federal governments has had the effect of modifying the estimates programs of many local agencies. Some have curtailed their coverage or shifted emphasis to subcounty areas such as census tracts. Often, they work within the framework of county or city estimates prepared by the State agency and/or the Bureau of the Census. Some local agencies have stopped producing estimates and projections in the face of such competition. A few have modified their estimates role to that of advisor to the State agency in the preparation of estimates or projections for their areas.

For the current survey, much effort was made to contact regional agencies comprehensively in addition to State, metropolitan, and city agencies covered in the 1969 survey. An initial mailing list was compiled from a list of agencies responding in the last two surveys, a list of census tract key persons, review of the Bureau's files on locally prepared estimates and projections, the directory of the National Association of Regional Councils, the Directory of Economic Development Districts and Area Grantees, and a list of coordinators and contacts for geographic coding guide programs.

The initial mailing was sent to about 1,300 agencies. Each agency received an estimates questionnaire, a projections questionnaire, and a supplemental form to be used for listing other agencies in the area also making estimates or projections. The returned supplemental forms were matched against the initial mailing list and survey forms were mailed to new contacts. More than 200 new agencies were added to the mailing list by this means. In the spring of 1976, followup letters and duplicate forms were sent out to about 600 agencies which had failed to respond to the original survey. This was supplemented by a limited telephone followup in 1976 and 1977 to clarify survey entries (particularly methodology) and to reach a few nonresponding agencies known to have active programs. Eventually responses were received from 1,211 agencies. Some 259 agencies never responded (17 percent) and 37 forms were undeliverable (2.5 percent).

Of the 1,510 agencies surveyed, 705 (47 percent) were either county or city offices (table 1). Another 584 (39 percent) were regional or metropolitan, and 212 (14 percent) were State agencies or State universities. There was a heavy predominance of planning agencies—945 (63 percent) of all agencies contacted. Planning agencies were more conscientious in responding to the survey, with 85 percent returning their questionnaires compared with an 80 percent overall response. Health agencies were very lightly represented in the survey with only 48 agencies contacted, mostly State health departments.

DETAILS OF THE SURVEY QUESTIONNAIRES

The survey questionnaires asked for information on (1) the areas for which estimates or projections are prepared (e.g., counties, cities, and census tracts) and (2) the characteristics for which the figures are prepared (e.g., age, sex, and race), as well as (3) a description of the methods used in the work. Other questions related to frequency of publication, the publication source, and whether unpublished figures were available to the public upon request. Questions were asked relating to whether the estimates were prepared and used for any specific State or local legislative purpose, for satisfying any Federal programs or Federal grant applications, or for determining eligibility for Federal funding.

Because of the complexities of projection techniques used and the many variations employed by respondents, no comprehensive editing of the questionnaires was completed. As a result, only a listing of the names and addresses of projection agencies and the area covered by the agency was prepared.

Copies of the questionnaires used in the survey are presented in appendix A of this report, together with a tally of the agencies contacted by State.

RESPONSE TO THE SURVEY

Of the 1,211 agencies responding to the survey, 474 have a current estimates program and the remaining 737 either indicated that they conducted no program or were found to have none. Some agencies misconstrued the distinction between estimates and projections, reporting an estimates program while indicating by method and dates covered that their program was for projections and not estimates. Three-quarters of the agencies making current estimates also made projections (358).

A substantially larger share of the agencies responding make population projections than make estimates (table 1). Some 277 agencies reported making projections but not estimates. A total of 635 agencies are involved in projections activities (52 percent of all respondents compared with 39 percent for estimates). Regional agencies were about twice as likely to make population projections as they were to make estimates. By contrast, there was little difference in the propensity to have one or the other type of program at the city level and only moderately more likelihood to make projections at the county, metropolitan, or State agency level.

City and county agencies dominated the list of estimating agencies, with 58 percent of the total (see table 1). Regional and metropolitan agencies constituted about 28 percent of the agencies making estimates. Councils of governments made up another 9 percent. There were 15 State agencies in addition to the 49 agencies active in the Federal-State Cooperative Program for Population Estimates.

Planning agencies dominate the field of population estimates—more than 70 percent of the active estimating agencies are in State, regional, metropolitan, county, and city planning.

Only a small number of quasi-governmental and non-governmental sources were included in the survey. Eight chambers of commerce and one public utility company are included in the list of estimating agencies.

Ohio and California had the largest number of agencies reporting estimates activities, with 35 and 33 respectively, followed by Texas with 28, Florida with 24, and Washington with 22 (appendix table A1). Every State had at least one, the State cooperating agency under the Federal-State Cooperative Program (Massachusetts and Texas excepted). No comparable Federal-State Cooperative Program exists for the preparation of population projections. In some States, the designated cooperating agency for estimates also prepares population projections, while in other States, the FSCP agency may not have entered into projection activities.

METHODS USED IN MAKING POPULATION ESTIMATES

A wide variety of estimating procedures is available for use by agencies making population estimates. What techniques they use will depend heavily upon the monetary and manpower commitment that they can make to an estimates program. Within these limitations they will make their selection of methods based on what demographic detail is needed, the symptomatic data available for use in preparing the estimates, access to data processing systems, and their familiarity with or awareness of available estimating techniques.

As the population size of the area being estimated decreases, the availability of symptomatic indicator data—births, deaths, school enrollment, or other variables reflective of population change—also is reduced. Because of this, the methodological options available to the estimating agency may narrow perceptibly. Experienced agencies commonly will avoid relying on a single estimating procedure, however, if they have the option of generating estimates using more than one accepted method.

The methods used by each of the agencies making population estimates are identified by broad type and area level in table 2. They are summarized later for four levels of areas: States, counties, cities or minor civil divisions, and census tracts. The methods in general use are categorized in the following discussion.

Component Methods

Component methods are those in which the components of population change since the last census (births, deaths, and net migration) are estimated separately.

Component methods generally rely upon the use of reported vital statistics to develop the birth and death components. The many varieties of component methods in use today are distinguished from one another by the way in which the migration component is estimated. In simple component methods, the migration component is obtained without benefit of symptomatic data indicators. In complex component methods, symptomatic data are used in a variety of ways to trace net migration (the net effect of migrants moving into an area minus migrants leaving the area).

Of the simple component methods, the Natural Increase method involves merely adding natural increase (births minus deaths) to the last census figure. It assumes that net migration since the last census equals zero. Another commonly used variation assumes that the net migration component will continue at the same volume or rate as in the recent past (usually the last intercensal period). These variations are easy to compile, but they fail to take advantage of much information that would permit a more realistic current measure of migration.

Probably the most widely used of the complex component methods is Component Method II,² in use by the Bureau of the Census during the last 25 years. In Component Method II, net migration is estimated on the basis of school enrollment or school census data from the difference between the actual population of elementary school age and the population of school age expected on the basis of the most recent census and births since the census.

²A general description of Component Method II and the Ratio-Correlation method is given in U.S. Bureau of the Census, Current Population Reports, Series P-25, No. 640. A description of the Administrative Records method is contained in Series P-25, any of reports 649 to 698.

In a recent variation developed by the Bureau of the Census, individual Federal income tax returns for two reporting years are matched to estimate migration. The Administrative Records method³ is the basis for comprehensive city and minor civil division estimates now used in Federal general revenue sharing allocations.

In other complex component methods, net migration is estimated in various other ways, such as the use of data on school enrollment for successive school years by grade (the Grade-Progression method), or by age (the Age-Progression method).

Regression Methods

The Ratio-Correlation method³ is a regression method widely used since the advent of the computer. A regression equation is developed for a series of areas from the last intercensal period, in which change in the distribution of selected symptomatic data series (the independent variables) is related to change in the distribution of population (the dependent variable). This equation is then used to establish the current population of the areas, given current trends in the independent variables.

Censal Ratio Methods

In the censal ratio methods, current symptomatic data are multiplied by the ratio of population to the same symptomatic data at the last census for the area for which the estimate is being made. A refinement of the method allows for a trend in this ratio between the census and the estimate date.

The Vital Rates method is a relatively simple censal ratio application in which reported birth and death statistics for an area on the last census date are converted to rates, adjusted to the estimate date by changes in these rates for some broader area which can be measured over time (commonly the U.S.), and divided into the number of reported births and deaths on the estimate data. The result is two estimates, one based on the birth rate and one on the death rate. These two estimates are then generally averaged to produce a single estimate. The procedure has the capability of producing estimates by race where vital statistics are reported in this detail.⁴

Composite Methods

In the Composite method, estimates of various age groups are derived separately and are then summed to secure a total for all ages. One method relies upon age-specific death rates. Another well-known variation, developed by Bogue and ³Ibid.

⁴See Donald J. Bogue, "A Technique for Making Extensive Population Estimates," Journal of the American Statistical Association, Vol. 45, No. 250, June 1950, pp. 149-163.

Duncan,⁵ uses age-specific death statistics to estimate ages 45 and over, age-specific birth statistics to estimate ages 15 to 44 and under 5, and school-enrollment data to estimate ages 5 to 14 years. The Bureau of the Census has utilized a simplified version using all deaths to estimate the population for ages 45 and over, all births to estimate 18 to 44, and Component Method II for the population under 18.

Other variations of the Composite method employ other combinations of "indicators" for various age groups. Composite methods permit the choice of those indicators best suited to a given age range and provide some age detail as a by-product.

Housing Unit Method

The most widely used estimating procedure in the United States today is the Housing Unit method. In this method, estimates of population are based on estimates of the residential housing inventory which in turn are based on data such as residential building and demolition permits issued, certificates of occupancy, electric, gas, or water meter connections, or field surveys. In a refinement of this method, allowance is made for change over time in the size of household in the area. Unless utility data are employed, some estimate of the current occupancy rate is required. Because of the lack of the necessary data to measure changes in the number of housing units for rural areas, the method is generally limited to urban areas.

Other Estimating Methods

The Proration method involves the distribution of an estimated total for some large area among the constituent parts, as an independently estimated county total among townships, on the basis of the population at the last census or on the basis of current symptomatic data, such as school data, births, or deaths. In its simplest form, this procedure implicitly assumes that the county's population is currently geographically distributed in the same proportion as at the last census, or that the ratio of population to the symptomatic item is the same for all of the townships in the county.

Two mechanical methods once widely in vogue are still utilized by some agencies although largely displaced by more sophisticated procedures. Arithmetic extrapolation assumes that the yearly amount of population change in an area in the postcensal period equals the average yearly amount of change in the area in a past period—usually the most recent intercensal period. In Geometric extrapolation, the average yearly rate of change is assumed to remain the same as in the past period. Both are essentially projection techniques.

The cohort component procedure is a standard projections technique used in demographic analysis. It ages a population over time (generally by 5-year ages and 5-year periods) on the basis of the population distribution on the last census and assumptions concerning births, deaths, and migration by cohort. Any agencies reporting that they used only this procedure were not considered to be making current population estimates and accordingly have not been included in the listings. However, many agencies utilize this method in conjunction with population totals derived from estimating techniques described above in order to obtain demographic detail on a current basis, specifically age, race, and sex. These reported usages are listed and tallied among the estimating methods.

Censuses and Surveys

Sample surveys are a means of obtaining current population estimates and particularly population characteristics. Because they are relatively expensive to design and implement, however, they are not as widely used for local estimates as might be expected. Some communities have resorted to conducting periodic censuses in lieu of developing an annual estimates program. In many of these cases censuses are taken with some frequency, generally under State supervision. This practice is largely restricted to a handful of States, with California, Florida, Massachusetts, Michigan, Oregon, and Washington being particularly active.

ACTIVITY OF STATE AGENCIES

The FSCP had largely preempted estimates activities at the State agency level, at least for county-level estimates. At this time, all but two States (Massachusetts and Texas) have an agency committed to the development of county estimates in cooperation with the Bureau of the Census. In table 2, the State agencies that are participants in the program are listed first in each State listing.

All FSCP agencies use three basic methods to develop the cooperative estimates—Component Method II, the Ratio-Correlation method (with each State having its unique regression equation and variables), and the Administrative Records method, with the Housing Unit method generally used for the last year of change for large metropolitan counties. Several States, however, used additional methods or some variation of the basic procedures. In five States the FSCP agencies produce an alternative series of county estimates by somewhat different procedures. These are noted in table 2. Although seemingly contradictory, these alternative estimates are generally required to meet State program needs in advance of the time when the FSCP estimates can be generated.

Twenty FSCP agencies develop estimates for subcounty areas. The predominant types of agencies in the program are State planning and health departments (in 15 and 11 States, respectively) and State universities (in 15 States). In Iowa, Minnesota, and North and South Carolina, an office of State demographer has recently been established to handle work such as this. Most of the State agencies are actively working with the Bureau in population estimates research at the county and subcounty level.

Outside of the FSCP there were only 15 State agencies reporting estimates activities (three of them with only a local rather than a Statewide function), making a grand total of 64 State agencies involved in estimates. Five of these agencies used the housing unit method and five used regression, censal ratio, component, or composite techniques. One conducted an annual census (Kansas), one a mid-decade census (Massachusetts), and only three of them relied on notably weaker estimating methods such as extrapolation or proration.

Table A shows the State agency types that have had estimates programs in the four surveys conducted in the 1960's and 1970's. State departments of health, which through the 1965 survey dominated the list of agencies, have fallen into third place behind State universities and State planning and development agencies. In 1965, 27 out of 66 agencies listed in the survey were State departments of health, and another 21 were offices within State university systems. In the 1975-76 survey, the leading contributors of population estimates were State universities (19 States, commonly bureaus of business research), State planning and development agencies (16 States), and State departments of health (13 States). The involvement of planning and development agencies in estimating activities is a relatively recent phenomenon. In the 1960 survey, only five such agencies were reported. By 1969 this had increased to 14 and by 1975-76 to 16.

ACTIVITY OF SUBSTATE AGENCIES

The survey obtained responses from 410 substate agencies indicating that they have active population estimates programs (table B). This is a very large increase over the number of "local" agencies reported in 1969 (241) and 1965 (118), reflecting both a decided growth in the number of agencies active in the field and an extension of the survey to a much larger universe than in the past. About 1,300 substate agencies were surveyed, compared with 405 in 1969 and 218 in 1965.

Nearly three-fourths of the substate agencies making population estimates are planning agencies (table 1), divided into three roughly equal areal groupings—87 regional and metropolitan agencies, 135 county agencies, and 100 city agencies. An agency's title often masked its actual areal coverage. For example, the term "regional" often was a part of the title for a county or metropolitan agency. To be classified as a regional agency in this report, an agency had to estimate for more than one county or more than a metropolitan area. Combined city-county agencies (about a dozen of them) were classified as county agencies.

DEMOGRAPHIC DETAIL AND GEOGRAPHIC EXTENT OF ESTIMATES PROGRAMS

Of the agencies making population estimates, the great majority estimate only for the total population, regardless of areal detail. Some four out of five agencies do not find it necessary to produce estimates of any other demographic detail (table C). Those few that do, however, commonly generate estimates by age, sex, and race, very often by a cohort-component procedure in conjunction with all-ages estimates by an independent methodology. Although age was the demographic characteristic most often developed, it was only estimated by about 15 percent of the agencies on the average. Characteristics were much more likely to be estimated for counties and cities than for other geographic subareas. Population estimates by race were rarely made; only about 10 percent of city estimates and 13 percent of county estimates were by race.

Estimates of the population of counties were made by almost 70 percent of the agencies having population estimates programs, and city estimates were made by three-quarters of the agencies (table C). Over 140 agencies estimate population down to the census tract level, and 156 agencies estimate for other small geographic subdivisions, such as traffic zones or planning areas often composed of census tracts.

The Housing Unit method is used by three-fourths of all substate estimating agencies (table 4), sometimes in combination with other methods. Many substate agencies employ more than one estimating procedure in their programs. Below the State level there was an average of 1.3 methods used per agency as compared with 3.3 methods for State agencies. Component methods were also very commonly used by these agencies.

Metropolitan Areas and Census Tracts

Roughly two-thirds of the 277 standard metropolitan statistical areas in the United States have agencies making current population estimates for the SMSA. These agencies are listed by SMSA in table 3, with some indication of the areas within the SMSA covered by these agencies. Since census tracts are statistical areas largely confined to SMSA's, it is to be expected that these agencies are the ones making population estimates for census tracts. Those metropolitan agencies making census tract estimates are marked with the symbol

CT in the "Area covered" column. The metropolitan areas not covered by estimates (also listed in table 3) are, for the most part, those with small populations. Population size alone, however, does not dictate the existence of an estimating agency in any given SMSA, nor does it guarantee the quality of the estimates program.

In addition to the 144 agencies preparing population estimates for census tracts, there were 97 other agencies which claimed to have data from which census tract estimates could be derived—building permits and demolition permits, utility hookups, vital statistics, and other sources. Because of ambiguities in the way the question was phrased in the survey, however, this probably is a considerable overstatement in the number of agencies actually having data series already relating to census tracts. During the next year the Bureau of the Census will be conducting a comprehensive review of population and housing estimates available by census tract for all metropolitan areas and will be investigating possible sources for the preparation of such estimates in SMSA's where none now exist for 1980 census planning purposes.

ACCURACY OF METHODS

All agencies involved in making population estimates must be concerned with the accuracy of the methods used to develop their estimates. The traditional procedure used to measure accuracy has been to compare the results of their methods with a census. For example, estimates for 1970 based on the 1960 census and data series reflecting population change since 1960 were compared with the 1970 census results to determine their validity and credibility. On the basis of these comparisons an agency must decide whether the method or methods used yielded sufficiently accurate results to merit continuing their use in the 1970's. Or they may use their findings as a basis for further evaluation or for selecting alternative methods or variations within existing methods to produce a stronger estimate for the upcoming decade. If censuses are available after 1970 (special censuses conducted by the Bureau of the Census or censuses monitored by State agencies, for example), then a more current evaluation of methodological procedures is possible.

The most comprehensive evaluation of methods for substate areas for 1970 was the one conducted jointly by the Bureau of the Census and State agencies under the FSCP. This test covered 2,600 counties in 42 States and evaluated four standard methods (Component Method II, the Composite method, the Ratio-Correlation method, and the Vital Rates method) plus a few additional procedures that were used in individual States only. The results of that test are contained in Current Population Reports, Series P-26, No. 21. The results of tests of accuracy of the Administrative Records method against post-1970 censuses are reported in Current Population Reports, Series P-25, any one of reports No. 649 to 698.

A few State agencies with long-standing population estimating programs also have published extensive evaluations of their substate estimates for 1970. Of the State and substate agencies covered in the survey, 166 claim to have conducted tests of accuracy in conjunction with the 1970 census.

Despite the large increase in the number of agencies with population estimates programs below the State level, the quality of these programs may have deteriorated since the surveys of the 1960's (table D). The large decline in the use of ratio-correlation or other regression methods since the 1969 survey is discouraging in view of the potential that this procedure has for small area estimates. Also a sizeable number of agencies report the use of extrapolative methods, which have been discredited in evaluations for more than two decades. The fact that the average number of methods used per agency remains unchanged since the 1969 survey also is disappointing, since more recent tests of accuracy suggest that no single method can be fully relied upon for small area estimates.⁶ There appears to be little evidence of innovative work in developing alternative estimating techniques despite the weaknesses demonstrated in the existing ones.

RELATED DATA

Results of earlier surveys of agencies making population estimates are published in Current Population Reports, Series P-25, No. 454, 328, 244, 178, and 116.

Selected unpublished information from the 1975-76 survey is available at the cost of page reproduction on request to Chief, State and National Estimates Branch, Population Division, Bureau of the Census, Washington, D.C., 20233. Included is such information as a list of agencies conducting tests of methods for 1970 and a summarization of data obtained from each agency in response to the survey.

The Bureau's current population estimates for States, counties, and county subdivisions are published annually in Current Population Reports, Series P-25 and P-26. State estimates for 1975 and 1976 appear in Series P-25, No. 642 (totals and components of change) and 646 (age). County and metropolitan area estimates for 1975 and 1976 are shown in a set of State reports in Series P-26, No. 76-1 through 76-50, plus a few selected State reports in Series P-25. City and minor civil division estimates for 1975 are available in a set of State reports in Series P-25, No. 649 through 698.

Special censuses of selected subareas of the United States have been taken by Bureau of the Census since the 1970 census at the request and expense of the individual subareas. Summary results of these censuses are published in Current Population Reports, Series P-28, No. 1500 (1970-72), 1507 and 1508 (1973), 1509 and 1512 (1974), 1522 and 1537 (1975), 1546 and 1552 (1976), and 1557 and 1558 (1977). Detailed special census reports by age, race, and sex are published in Series P-28 for areas of 50,000 and over.
